Fifty years have now passed since Bill Gates and Paul Allen founded Microsoft to sell the Basic programming language. Their vision was to have a computer on every desk and one in every home. In the years since, Microsoft has fundamentally changed how we work and how we live.

The very core of Microsoft has been to offer development tools with associated platforms to developers. This creates network effects, while keeping the platforms technologically relevant. The company has always been inspired by new technologies to create its own solutions that have been integrated into its ecosystem. This reduces technology risk and has enabled the 50-year-old company to retain and improve its market position.

It all started when they created their own version of IBM's DOS operating system, which was named MS DOS. WordPerfect led to Word and Lotus 123 to Excel. Later, they were inspired by Apple's window-based operating system, which resulted in Windows. They competed with Sony's Playstation by launching their own games console, Xbox. Netscape was the pioneer among web browsers but was overtaken by Internet Explorer (and Google's Chrome). Amazon was the first to offer cloud services, but Microsoft has become a strong runner-up, and it's a long way down to third and fourth place. When we all moved into home offices during the pandemic, Zoom was the new meeting place. It was quickly ousted when Microsoft launched Teams.

When Satya Nadella took over as CEO in 2014, he wanted to make the company less dependent on PCs. He opened up the company's development tools to open source and acquired GitHub to become relevant to a new generation of developers. Cloud services now account for over half of the company's revenue.

In 2019, they partnered with OpenAI (ChatGPT) with a 49 per cent stake through a $13 billion investment. Today, OpenAI is valued at $300 billion. The partnership gives Microsoft an exclusive right to offer the AI models in its cloud.

Nadella is known for being pragmatic and adaptable. Even with the partnership with OpenAI, Chinese DeepSeek's R1 model was made available in Microsoft's cloud less than two weeks after it was launched.

In parallel with the partnership with OpenAI, Microsoft is developing its own artificial intelligence models. Through Copilot, artificial intelligence will be built into the various programme packages. Again, the ecosystem will be important, as Microsoft holds the companies' own data so that it is available to train the artificial intelligence models.

Pareto Global first invested in Microsoft in November 2012. At the time, the company was very unpopular, having flopped with mobile phones and Windows 8. Net cash represented 25 per cent of the market capitalisation. During our ownership period, revenue growth has steadily accelerated, while the operating margin has increased. Not many companies manage this combination because growth is costly, which causes margins to fall. The corporate market accounts for 70 per cent, where revenues are secured by long-term agreements with recurrent earnings.

With a high weight in the fund and a return of over 1,900% in euros, this has been a fantastic journey and an important contributor to the return of Pareto Global. Congratulations on the anniversary!
