April was marked by heightened volatility and uncertainty following the tariff announcement by the US administration on April 2. The announcement was more severe than markets had anticipated, triggering a broad risk-off sentiment across asset classes.

In credit markets, spreads widened notably in both US and Europe as markets repriced the risk of the direct impact of higher tariffs, potential disruptions to global trade, and the indirect effects of rising inflation and growing recession risks.

However, markets rebounded strongly after the US administration on April 9 announced a 90-day pause on tariffs and signalled a willingness to engage in negotiations with other countries. There remains significant uncertainty regarding the administration's ultimate objectives and how the situation will evolve, but negotiations are at least a step in the right direction.

Throughout the month, we observed continued weakness in the US dollar, while US Treasury yields rose steadily. This divergence from the typical "flight to quality" behaviour, where rising uncertainty and volatility usually strengthen the dollar and lower Treasury yields, is uncommon and warrants attention. The explanation is likely multifaceted, but the high level of US indebtedness and the unpredictability of the US administration certainly contributed to these developments.

As anticipated, the fund experienced weaker performance early in the month, reflecting the overall market and driven mainly by spread widening. However, following the tariff pause announcement, there was a strong recovery. Despite the volatility and uncertainty, the fund's performance for the month ended in positive territory.

The reporting season for Q1 2025 has kicked off. During the month, we also received our last Q4 2024 reports. The Q4 2024 reporting period has overall been satisfactory, with a vast majority of our issuers meeting or exceeding our expectations. Most of the companies in the fund have limited direct exposure to tariffs. However, we are observing increasingly uncertain outlooks, as a result of the tariffs, particularly related to inflationary pressures and demand uncertainty. These factors will remain a key focus as we review the Q1 2025 reports.

Primary market activity was muted overall in April, reflecting elevated uncertainty and volatility. At the end of the month, a few issuers came back to the primary market, supported by the strong rebound. We participated in one new deal by TDC, a Danish telecom company and a well familiar name in the fund. We expect the primary market to be better in May, provided that no new developments emerge that could impact the sentiment negatively.
